"It would seem that no conflict - no problem, but this is only a seeming opinion, since people are not yet used to coexist together on the same territory, to communicate amicably and to some extent depend on each other.

Well, it's time to get busy developing the spirit of teamwork and establishing friendly relations in the new team, where rivalry, adolescent maximalism and sick teenage ego reigns. A "combustible mixture," but still have to find common ground.

This issue should be dealt with, first of all, by the head of the group and the curator, since they are officially responsible for all areas of life of the academic group as a whole and all of its members individually. But how to do it? There are several options that have been tested in practice.

Option one. "And we're all good."

Nothing brings unfamiliar students together like going out together. Of course we are talking about a noisy and fun feast, we just need to find the right place, the right time, and a compelling reason for fun. Well here already teenage imagination is enough, the more so to go out and have a good time students know, since the first year.

So, the first reason is the beginning of studies, the second reason is acquaintance, the third reason is the first test and so on. The main thing is to get together, and the place should be a compromise and ideal for all present.

For example, some freshmen choose a quiet cafe, others choose the student cafeteria, while others prefer to gather at a fellow student's dacha or home.

Consumption of alcohol at such "introductory meetings" is extremely undesirable, because the noisy company is still unfamiliar, and you do not know what to expect from tipsy classmates.

Of course, to declare the so-called "dry law" is also not recommended, and to control this important issue should definitely be the head of the academic group.

To make the time pass merrily and unnoticeably, it is necessary to make a scenario of the party beforehand and collectively choose the most ardent activists who will support the fun and will gladly act in front of the audience as a non-drinking presenter and a restless toastmaster.

Inviting the curator of the academic group to such an event is undesirable, because the atmosphere will immediately become tense, and the general topics will end after the first toast: "To all the good things".

Otherwise, what's not a way to unite the academic group? The main thing is to think out all the details and discuss the nuances beforehand!

Option two. "Tra-ta-ta, we're bringing the cat along."

The best way to bring the academic group together is to go camping together or just spend a weekend in nature with tents.

First, it is very exciting to prepare for the trip together, to determine the provisions and temporary shelter.

Secondly, during the trip there is no uncomfortable moments of silence, which only inflame the situation.

Thirdly, joint photos in nature - this is another step to getting closer to the academic group, getting common emotions and memories in the future.

Fourthly, common activities always unite them, such as setting up tents, gathering firewood for the fire, cooking, even songs with a guitar will make classmates closer and closer.

And the last thing: in such a trip you can learn a lot of new and fascinating of life fellow students, soak up new feelings and continue to demonstrate only his benevolence in the address of his opponent.

It only remains to add that this collective event also requires pre-organization, and for this again you need to choose a proven activist who will take care of all organizational matters.

He must make sure that the vacation was great, and the desire to get together as a group arose again and again in the academic group.

A study group leader can be brought along on such a nature trip, ensuring that it is safe and that all students are taken home when it is over.

In an informal setting to communicate with the class teacher will be much easier, and he somewhat moves away from the so-called "class division". Believe me, after such a weekend relationship with fellow students will definitely change for the better.

Option three. Team "UH".

As you know, modern universities hold sports team competitions, in which all courses and all academic groups have to participate.

The idea is good - to test the physical fitness of students and rally academic groups with a common desire to win. Most often these sports events are held in the fall and spring in the fresh air, when the weather does not upset the rain, slush, frost and snow.

And now after entering the first year you can already find contact with your classmates in September, get acquainted closer and even single out the favorites.

From the academic group at the sports championship requires a team name, motto, chanting and, of course, the team captain. It does not hurt the excellent physical preparation, because the end result - is an unqualified victory.
